Excerpt: . . . peasant riding a stunted gray horse, which carried its head close to the ground and was less uncouth in appearance than its master; or a dealer in furs, sitting in a cart drawn by a pair of reindeer; behind the cart a long rope would be dragging, with knots at frequent intervals, the said knots being supposed, as they jumped around in the road from one stone to another, to frighten off the wolves. If Ordener asked the dealer in furs to direct him to the cave of Walderhog, the answer would be: -- Keep to the northwest; you will come to the village of Hervalyn, pass through the ravine of Dodlysax, and by night you can make Surb, which is but two miles from Walderhog. Thus the nomad trader, who cared for nothing beyond the names and location of the places which lay on his...
