Excerpt: . . . may not, at least until after the consequences of its absence manifest themselves, exhibit sufficient caution and restraint in using their vast powers to extend credit, is not imaginary or fanciful. It is the inevitable conclusion which one must reach from an examination of many of the reasons which have been brought forward during the last few years to secure popular support for the method of banking reform exemplified both in the bill of the National Monetary Commission and in the Glass-Owen bill. Although I may seem to be going somewhat beyond the proper limits of my subject, I hope I may be pardoned if I indicate some few of the unfounded hopes which have been raised in the minds of the people during the discussion of the last few years--hopes which will make much trouble for those who may be entrusted with responsibility for the successful operation of the federal reserve banks. The bill of the National Monetary Commission contained a provision requiring the National Reserve Association to discount at a uniform rate through the country. This requirement was contrary to sound banking principles and altogether impracticable in a country in which such diverse financial and economic conditions coexist as in the United States. It is one of the most satisfactory results of the regional bank plan that this uniform rate ceases to be even politically necessary. In urging the merits of both the Glass-Owen bill and that of the monetary commission, large...
